Dear Mr. Bryan:

Thank you for forwarding to me e-mails from your competitor in Southern California that contain false, misleading and defamatory attacks on Amsec. I have referred this matter to our corporate counsel for action.

It is unfortunate that representatives of this competitor have engaged in this sort of mudslinging. Amsec avoids these types of attacks on competitors and instead has been an industry leader in attempting to encourage safe companies to participate in independent, verifiable testing of products so customers have objective comparisons of security and fire performance.

UL is the industry's accepted testing authority for burglary protection. Amsec has products that are listed by UL for all of these applicable ratings: RSC, TL15, TL30 and TL30X6. A member of the Amsec staff has served on the UL Standards Technical Panel for the past 25 years. The safes you use in your jewelry safe lines, our BF RSC listed (Security and Gun) safes and all TL rated safes, are 100% produced in our California factory. These TL rated safes are trusted by such companies as Chase Bank, Zales Jewelers and Cinemark Theatres to protect their corporate assets.

UL also offers standardized fire testing. Use of verified fire testing has been generally accepted by the traditional safe industry. Our BF Security Safe pioneered combining verified fire protection with an RSC security rating. Unfortunately, verified testing is not as common in the gunsafe industry. To the best of my knowledge, Amsec is one of only two gunsafe manufacturers who have subjected their products to fire testing at nationally recognized independent testing laboratories. We are working to promote consistent test standards and verified testing throughout the gunsafe industry. We think this is critical to minimizing customer confusion.

For more than 65 years, Amsec has been a leading manufacturer of burglary and fire-resistant safes for commercial and residential customers alike. Thank you for your continued support.

Sincerely,
